The objective of this study is to develop a conceptual model to simulate and evaluate the optimal environmental water conditions in the water-quality management system for both phosphorus (P) and nitrogen (N) in a river basin. Based on the study on Taihu Lake (Chinese name: Dongtai), the water-quality classification of phosphorus and nitrogen are established, and a river water-quality model is used to simulate P and N water quality in Taihu River Basin. Four water-quality classes are assigned for model formulation: Class A-High-P and N, Class B-Moderate-P and N, Class C-Low-P and N, and Class D-No-N and P. Based on the total annual sedimentation flux predicted by the present transport model, more than 20% of input P and N loads can be removed from Class A to Class B. As a result, most of the water-quality problems can be solved, with the lowest concentrations of P and N at Class B. The optimal conditions of Class C is more suitable for P disposal than the optimal conditions of Class A, whereas the optimal conditions of Class C is more suitable for N disposal than the optimal conditions of Class A.EVERY sixth grade student here has a set of maps in her backpack — maybe even a World Atlas — but not every school has access to technology that allows students to open up a multi-layered exploration of a subject as complex as the globe.
