He writes that he has been chased by a large force of Yagerous, Southerners in the East, and is now fleeing with his brother Hiram. This account is somewhat different from the one that we read in B of America, 16, B of Missouri, 16, and the Chicago History book. B of America states, "These were the orders made by the brethren regarding Joseph Smith: "That he should be taken; if he could not be taken, that he should be knocked down; and if he could not be knocked down, that they should stand him on his feet." --"They" are the brethren named in the First Presidency. Joseph reports "they" but the context fails to reveal whose "they" are. The "they" may be the brethren, but the only "they" with power to give such an order are Joseph's counselors. In the Missouri version, the statement that Joseph reports, is changed to read: "That they should knock him down and tie him up." The original statement continues: "But his friends started to the rescue, saved him from his tormentors, and brought him into town where they left him, as they saw that the Yagers were not going to stop until they got him." So far as can be ascertained, this is the only instance that the brethren ever used these words to describe what the Yagers had in store for Joseph. In the Chicago history (Herbert S. Biggs), it is said: "On Tuesday night they [the brethren] concluded to send for Joseph, who
