Changes include allowing for a variety of services to be performed by independent contractors, rather than employees, such as home health aides and certified nursing assistants, among others. "The rules that we have are more than 50 years old, and they really don't reflect our economy and the new way we work today," said Janice Dunlop, deputy director of human services. Dunlop said the changes would help to allow more than 75 percent of jobs in the city to be done by independent contractors. Advertisement "But we are not trying to change the job, rather we are trying to change how we do our jobs," she said. The department is working with the city's labor unions to talk about the new rules. One new suggestion would require an independent contractor to have a minimum level of training and to demonstrate a certain level of experience to prove that they are qualified to do the jobs they are being hired to do, Dunlop said. The city is also considering changing the definition of "personal care services" to ensure home health aides can bill for non-routine services, such as those requiring self-direction, taking the phone to call a physician
