Friday, January 27, 2017 The State Bar of Wisconsin wants its ban on confidential financial dispute resolution services to remain in effect, despite the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Novartis v. As in the case of the National Association of Attorneys General and almost all state bar associations, the Wisconsin State Bar has argued that it is within its authority to impose rules and regulations on its members. The Wisconsin Supreme Court ruled that state law bars the Wisconsin State Bar from imposing such a ban in 2014. Most state bar associations ended the bans in the wake of the Novartis case, which ruled that existing arbitration agreements were unenforceable if they required the exchange of confidential information. As for the future, the American Bar Association suggested that the Novartis decision may support those rules. I confess that I am a very slow reader, but reading quickly enough to keep up with the Wisconsin State Bar's legal arguments about the scope of the court's ruling in the Novartis case is a tough job. My understanding is that the bar association did not provide any legal arguments for its position. Of course, if the bar association wins that round, it is probably not far-fetched to expect it to spend a considerable amount of time and energy trying to convince the Supreme Court that the Novartis case does not apply to bar associations. And of course, that would be the subject of a post of its own.Share this article on LinkedIn Email Red Bull Formula 1 team principal Christian Horner says the major rule changes for the 2014 season will cost the world championship-contending team at least "one point per season". The changes include the introduction of KERS to the new V6 turbo engines, which go on sale next month. Horner expects the technology to deliver roughly 80 more horsepower than last season, but claimed the increased power was all lost through the lack of a gearbox in Red Bull's Renault-powered RB7. "It's not a question of if, but when the costs rise," said Horner. "The regulations have now moved to a stage where one year the KERS costs us a point and the following year we've moved on to the RebeccaGoogle, please meet Home Talk: The Internet search company's voice search app is about to add Google Assistant so you can talk to the computer and talk to Google. The patent app, discovered by 9to5Google, is pretty cool. Google Music, Maps, and Drive support as an example of what Google can do with voice commands. Here are some of the things the voice app will let you do: - Find your favorite artists, albums, songs and movies - Control which apps you have running - Make calls and send SMS - Receive new voice-search results while you are driving - Find out what you need to do in the next day, week, month - Check your email and calendar - Check the weather and show you a map of your commute to work - Join a Google Hangout group - Play a song you love - Play music that's playing in the background - Play a podcast or audiobook - Find and start watching videos - New features added every week The application works by capturing your voice commands and sending them back to the
