successful sieges, especially those that allow for the occupation of a town, can be the most profitable of all the siege actions. they often start with the construction of a ram and siege tower, which are used to breach the walls of a castle. this can be a dangerous and time-consuming process, as the walls are usually built to withstand ram attacks. a siege can be a long-term undertaking, as at the start a large force of crossbowmen and light infantry is usually deployed. a siege can be prevented or broken by the defenders, who may set up defences or even a sortie to attack the besiegers. the siege can also fail if the defenders are too well-organized or have too much garrison inside the castle. in the latter case, the besiegers may have to abandon the siege and try another target. if the siege is successful, the defenders may retreat or may fight the besiegers. the former is usually done by cutting the supply lines, or by breaking out of the siege with a sortie. if the defenders of the castle are successful in breaking out of the siege and escape to another stronghold, the siege may be called off. if the defenders of the castle are defeated, the castle may be razed, and the attackers may take the supplies inside. after you have chosen your target, your siege equipment will appear on the battle map, where you will get to name it. you will also be provided with your starting supplies. note that you need to own the target location before you can build your siege equipment - the game will not let you choose it from the neutral or enemy starting inventories. instead, you will receive the option to choose a location near the target. so in other words, if you choose the wrong location, you will have to find a new target. you will have to make it yourself, and the game will not pick the target for you.

Mount And Blade Warband Siege Tower

a siege may not be a sure thing if the garrison is of a size that can easily defend themselves against you. just as in other sieges, the siege will proceed in waves: one wave may consist of a large force of infantry and archers, and a smaller force of mounted troops and spearmen. the troops will sweep the area around the castle to gather information, and while they are doing that, the mounted troops and spearmen will try to break through the walls and capture the ground in front of the gates. once the walls are breached, the mounted troops will move in to the courtyard, and the infantry will be on their way to the gates. as in a regular siege, a siege tower will be built to help the attackers breach the walls. a siege tower is built by right-clicking your siege commander inside the castle walls. the siege tower will then be launched toward the walls, and it will keep attacking the walls until the walls are breached. you can then use the tower as a platform to start fighting inside the castle. as mentioned above, the tower will attack the walls until the walls are breached, which will usually only take a few minutes. once the walls have been breached, the attackers will use the tower to attack the defenders from the inside of the castle. to keep attacking the walls, the tower will need to have its assault pad equipped and it will need to be targeted by a siege commander. once inside, it is important to keep a line of defence. the siege will progress in waves, with archers and the first wave of the mounted troops attacking one side of the castle and the mounted spearmen on the other. once the walls have been breached, the attackers will begin moving into the castle. the defenders will be able to repel these attackers, but not easily - the attackers can still kill a lot of the defenders. if the attackers don't have a siege commander, they will try to retreat and regroup; a successful counterattack will destroy all attackers, but if you have siege gear, you can keep the attackers bottled up. once the attackers have been defeated, they will drop their siege equipment and start rebuilding their siege tower. 5ec8ef588b
