Substance Painter X64 2019.2.0.3242 With Is Here Crack ((TOP))

i try and place the folds anywhere and everywhere. i end up with multiple folds, so i'm just going to do one since these cracks all have the same dimensions. here i use an additional pattern of voronoi shapes with a single segment to drive the voronoi edge right near the base. for this step, i find that it's important to wait until the base is ready before adding this pattern. when you go to add the small pieces, this is the time to make sure the base is set and stable. this isn't a render issue, so trying to add the small parts before the cracks are in place is a recipe for failure. in the example below, the uncolored rough surface breaks the heavy compression lines on the morph. in my work, i often add a small amount of texture to the rough bevel in order to make the underlying pattern more visible. once you know the shape of the cracks, creating the actual cracks is easy. i took some crack splines in zbrush, saved them as a fbx, and then imported them to substance painter to create the "shell" of the cracks. i do this by marking the vertices that can be moved freely, then moving these vertices to create a model around the outside edge of the cracks. you can also switch it to a directional bevel to create a curled pattern. when finished, the cracks can be connected together using spline nodes and the connecting handles to create a nice smooth formation. the cracks will blend together nicely and will have less sharp edges. at this point, the cracking pipe is finished. normally, you would already be outputting the cracks, for this crack, i'm going to create the mask using the geometry of the cracks. so, i created a wave texture, added a curvature and moved the texture node up to the "curve" node to create the mask. this is similar to creating a crack with a beveled mask, except you can use a pattern instead of just a single color. when done, i used the same mask, but moved it to the "bevel" node. the invert, multiply by -1. then the curve is turned off. finally, i added a glow to the mask output. i'll explain the glow settings later.

to make the cracks, i used voronoi fracture. there are a few things to think about with voronoi fracture when doing these types of materials. first, they can look very similar to traditional sculpting tools, so its important to have a very distinct set of tools for these materials. i use a lot of weight paint for this, with a few passes done in the toolkit section of the painter. the other consideration is that voronoi fracture can have a lot of options for tweaking. at first, i didnt realize that any settings would be shared between different patterns, and so i designed a new setup. even that wasnt perfect, and ill show you the updates in the next section. the first set of patterns are related to the voronoi tessellation method that is used to generate the patterns. each pattern gets the last values from the previous rows, so the first pixels are based on the last row, the 2nd based on the last two rows, and so on. the results are very close to each other, and look identical until you zoom in. in the cases of small details, the small parts of the voronoi patterns get scattered in a very random way, and so the results are very consistent from one pattern to the next, even if there are a lot of different patterns. the next set of patterns were designed to switch colors for different size classes based on their saturation. i designed the first layer to switch from the outside-in. when size class 11 was reached, the color switched to blue. the next layer started as the color 10, and continued in one class at a time. in the next section, i will show you the final colors. the outside-in pattern is not a physical thing, but rather a design choice for composition. it meant that the first layer of the cracks was very blue, but as they got larger and would have more layers to add to them, the colors would change to white. there are a lot of cases where you can get unexpected results, and so if you feel unsure of your path, make lots of tests and tweak them. this is a lot of fun! 5ec8ef588b
